Fast foods are not all 'junk' foods

By SHIRLEY W. WALTON
Extension Agent

Fast foods are not all junk foods. Consumer selections and demands are slowly changing the menus at fast food outlets around the nation. One often hears that fast foods are junk foods. This is not true. Actually, fast foods are full of nutrients buy they are not necessarily the ones that a person may want to consume in great quantities.

For example, fast foods can provide too much fat, sugar, sodium and calories for those individuals who are watching their calories and their weight. Did you know that approximately 140,000 fast food outlets in the United States account for 45 percent of the eating-out places available to hungry consumers? This is why we need to be very much aware of what is being served and where.

Americans spend approximately $23 billion a year on hamburgers, french fries, shakes, pizza, chicken and tacos from the fast food menus. Careful selection of the fast food offerings can help prevent an inexpensive convenience from becoming a dietary danger.

A recent U.S. Department of Agriculture study found that most fast food entrees, fries and sauces to be high in fat, while the desserts and shakes were high in both fat and sugar. These fast food entrees were also low in fiber, which is an important element in a good dietary plan.

By adding salad bars, some fast food chains have increased the nutritional benefit of their meals. The high sodium content of most fast foods also can be a drawback for people who must restrict sodium intake. One fast food meal can supply all the sodium a person should have for a 24-hour period of time.

Good News For Homemakers
HOME ECONOMICS

Other fast food chains are adding things such as baked potatoes which are very nutritious and other items to go with the baked potato, such as broccoli, cheese, bacon, etc. Our fast food places are definitely going creative and trying to reach consumers' needs.

A consumer can enjoy fast food meals and reduce potential nutritional disadvantages by following these tips:

1. Eat a variety of foods instead of one favorite all the time.

2. Add plenty of fruits, vegetables, whole grain and dairy products to the meals eaten at home.

3. Maintain ideal body weight. Fast foods can be high in calories. Choose the small, instead of the large size fries to reduce calories. The same holds true for the calories-laden shakes and soft drinks sweetened with sugar. Why not try unsweetened coffee or tea? Better still, why not order milk?

4. Try to avoid excessive amounts of fat. Do without the mayonnaise and fatty sauces.

5. Eat foods with starch and fiber, such as vegetable salad ingredients.

6. Substitute skim milk or orange juice for soft drinks.

Making informed food choices is difficult if fast food outlet only offers a limited menu, but consumer requests can lead to changes. Because the growth of the fast food industry has slowed, competition between chains is getting stronger and the firms are making every effort to please their health conscious consumers. Consumers are demanding more information about nutrition and the industry is certainly responding.
